“In no small part, what American corporations have become is what Peters has encouraged them to be.”—The New Yorker

“Peters is … the father of the post-modern corporation.”—Los Angeles Times

“We live in a Tom Peters world.”—Fortune

“In a short space of a quarter of a century, Tom Peters has produced or popularized ways of thinking that have altered the way we view the world. … These new ways of thinking have facilitated alternative ways for managers to act that have, in turn, precipitated wider changes in the way we live our lives.”—David Collins, Narrating the Management Guru: In Search of Tom Peters

“In Tom’s world it’s always better to try a swan dive and deliver a colossal belly flop than to step timidly off the board while holding your nose.”—Fast Company

“Tom Peters is the most provocative and engaging (as well as annoying and threatening) management guru running loose in America today.”—CBS MarketWatch

“If they’re onto a good thing, management gurus generally milk the same business mantra for all its worth. Maybe they throw in a few new catch phrases or rework the key speeches, but the principal message remains unchanged. However, one guru par excellence goes against the grain. The one-man brand that is Tom Peters is still reinventing himself. While others of his age think of retirement, the man who co-wrote In Search of Excellence back in 1982 is still cranking up the volume on new ideas he thinks the workplace ought to hear.”—CNN.com

“Mr. Peters is an enthusiast, a storyteller and a lover of capitalism. He says that Effective management is management that delivers more value to customers and more opportunity for service, creativity and growth to workers. He is saying that the decent thing to do is also the smart thing. It’s a wonderful message.”
—Paul Weaver, Hoover Institute, in the Wall Street Journal.

“Execution is strategy.”—Tom Peters

Fortune called Tom Peters the “Ur-guru” of management (he doesn’t know what that means either, but admits “it sounds pretty good”), and compares him to Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry David Thoreau, Walt Whitman, and H.L. Mencken. The Economist tagged him the “Uber-guru”—and BusinessWeek’s take on his “unconventional views” led them to label him “business’s best friend and worst nightmare.” The Bloomsbury Press book, Movers and Shakers: The 100 Most Influential Figures in Modern Business, reviewed the historical contributions of path-breaking management thinkers and practitioners, from Machiavelli and J.P. Morgan to Tom and Jack Welch. The summary entry on Tom’s impact:

“Tom Peters has probably done more than anyone else to shift the debate on management from the confines of boardrooms, academia, and consultancies to a broader, worldwide audience, where it has become the staple diet of the media and managers alike. Peter Drucker has written more and his ideas have withstood a longer test of time, but it is Peters—as consultant, writer, columnist, seminar lecturer, and stage performer—whose energy, style, influence, and ideas have shaped new management thinking.”
Without much doubt, Peter Drucker and Tom Peters have shaped the idea of modern management more than any others over the last six decades. Drucker is said to have “invented” management as a discipline worthy of study—in particular, he gave management of large firms the essential tools to deal with their post-World War II enormity, complexity, and growing global reach. Tom Peters, in turn, led the way in preparing management for the current era of staggering change, starting in the mid-1970s.

In particular, in 1982, with the publication of In Search of Excellence, Tom and Bob Waterman helped American firms deal with a crushing competitive challenge to their primacy by urging them to get away from strategies based on just the numbers, and re-focused on the basic drivers of all successful businesses throughout time: people, customers, values—“culture” (“the way we do things around here”), action-execution, a perpetual self-renewing entrepreneurial spirit. As “obvious” as these ideas are, they were, are, and always will be the bedrock and differentiator of excellent enterprise—and subject to constant and remarkably rapid slippage if left untended for even a moment.

Tom and Bob also effectively introduced the world of business to the notion of Excellence per se, a state of mind and daily practice not normally associated with enterprise, and an inspiring and pragmatic and profitable aspiration. In short, then and now, the unwavering pursuit of Excellence, from the finance department to after-sales service, in the car dealership and police department as well as the bank branch and aircraft factory, provides the basis for an unmatchable competitive advantage—and acts on one and all as an ongoing spur to path-breaking achievement. And in our global village, getting flatter by the day as it is, Excellence is a universal idea-ideal (think Olympics) that translates and transports across all borders.

In 1999, In Search of Excellence was honored by NPR as one of the “Top Three Business Books of the Century;” it was ranked as the “greatest business book of all time” in a poll by Britain’s Bloomsbury Publishing; and was the most widely held library book in the United States from 1989 to 2006. Tom has followed Search with well over a dozen additional international bestsellers. Among them: A Passion for Excellence (with Nancy Austin); Thriving on Chaos; Liberation Management (acclaimed as the “Management Book of the Decade” for the ’90s); a series of three books in 1999 on the new world of work, including the landmark The Brand You 50; and in 2003 the provocative, colorful Re-imagine!: Business Excellence in a Disruptive Age. Along the way, several Tom Peters biographies have been published, including: Corporate Man to Corporate Skunk: The Tom Peters Phenomenon and Tom Peters: The Bestselling Prophet of the Management Revolution (part of a four-book series of business biographies on Peters, Bill Gates, Peter Drucker, and Warren Buffett).

Tom, who is widely credited with almost single-handedly “inventing” the public “management guru industry,” now global in scope and billions of dollars in size, writes, reflects, and then presents about 30 seminars each year, well over half outside the U.S. (In a four-week period in 2009, he spoke in Korea, Mexico, Turkey, Argentina and Croatia.) Tom estimates that since 1978, when the work on Search began, he’s given well over 2,500 speeches, flown 5,000,000+ miles, spoken before 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 people and presented in 48 states and 67 countries. Also, since 2004, Tom has devoted significant “at home” energy to the award-winning blog—www.tompeters.com (a “Top 500” blog designation and 9th ranked among the “Top 150 Management & Leadership Blogs”); and beginning in 2009 he has actively engaged his global network via Twitter (where he has also made various “top sites for …” lists).

Leadership guru Warren Bennis, the only person close to both Tom and the late Peter Drucker, told a journalist, “If Peter Drucker invented modern management, Tom Peters repainted it in Technicolor.” In fact, as even Tom’s book titles indicate (“Excellence” … “Passion” … “Liberation”), his passion is passion: destruction & re-imagining … finding and liberating (“beyond measure”) talent for a hypercompetitive world … the Herculean task of sustaining entrepreneurial excellence even in enormous organizations … an enterprise-wide obsession with design that produces products and services of the sort that Steve Jobs calls “insanely great.” Among Tom’s newer campaigns are: women-as-leaders especially suited for these times; gaining advantage in the enormous, underserved markets represented by women (who control most of the developed world’s wealth) and among the burgeoning, financially potent and absurdly underserved boomer-geezer population in the likes of North America, Europe and Japan; and a fixation on safety and operational and patient-focused Excellence in our biggest industry, healthcare.
As we were engulfed by the economic crisis in 2008, Tom once again shifted gears, perhaps downshifted, renewing his dedication to what he labels the “eternal basics” of implementation-execution, among other things a topic of research he pioneered at Stanford in the 1970s. “We create and then get caught up in, me included, an endless parade of fads,” he says, “but while the world is indeed changing, the basics of ‘getting things done through people,’ my great passion, remain the same as they were a hundred, or hundreds, of years ago—and it is failures in implementation that trip us up in 9 cases out of 10, from a primary school in Nashville or Nigeria to ‘nation-building’ in Basra and Baghdad. In business, for example, developing a brilliant ‘blue ocean strategy,’ today’s hot buzzphrase, is all well and good, but make no mistake, engaged and enthusiastic people executing like maniacs in that ocean is the only thing that will keep it blue and keep you sailing with spinnaker full! ‘Excellence in Execution’ was, is, wherever and forever will be Sustainable Competitive Advantage #1.”

This recent emphasis/re-emphasis was marked in March 2010 by HarperCollins’ publication of Tom’s The Little BIG Things: 163 Ways to Pursue Excellence. The book, praised by leadership guru Warren Bennis as “the best management book I have ever read,” is indirectly derived from Tom’s observations at tompeters.com; it ranges far and wide, discussing everything from the impact of clean restrooms in retail to the power of apology to the sources of human resilience to observations on the economic crisis of 2007++. Though applicable in any circumstance, it is primarily aimed at maintaining one’s wholehearted commitment to Excellence in difficult times riven with uncertainty and ambiguity.

Born in Baltimore in 1942 “with a lacrosse stick in one hand and oars over my shoulder,” Tom resided in California, mainly Silicon Valley (where he was on a list of “100 most powerful people in Silicon Valley”), from 1965–2000. Today, Tom and his wife Susan Sargent, textile designer and icon in the home furnishings industry, live on a 1,600-acre working farm, “always under construction,” in Vermont. (To escape VT’s winter, Tom admits to “an annual 6-week timeout at a beach shack on New Zealand’s incomparable South Island.”) His two stepsons, Max and Ben Cooper, are “busy changing the world” in Telluride and Brooklyn respectively.

Tom is a civil engineering graduate of Cornell (B.C.E., M.C.E.), where he’s included in the book The 100 Most Notable Cornellians, and earned an MBA and Ph.D. in business at Stanford; he holds honorary doctorates from institutions that range from the University of San Francisco to the State University of Management in Moscow—and has been honored by dozens of associations in content areas such as management, leadership, quality, human resources, customer service, innovation, marketing, and design. In the U.S. Navy from 1966–1970, he made two deployments to Vietnam (as a combat engineer in the fabled Navy Seabees) and “survived a tour in the Pentagon.” He was a White House drug-abuse advisor in 1973–74, and then worked at McKinsey & Co. from 1974–1981, becoming a Partner in 1979; he also co-founded McKinsey’s now gargantuan Organization Effectiveness practice. Tom’s chief avocations are “brushcutting in the summer, hiking in New Zealand in the winter, reading history books by the hundredweight, collecting weird friends, talking to cab drivers, visiting Venice, and racing George Clooney in accumulating frequent flyer miles.”
